Chinese Justice,

They do things differently in China. Here in America when a man burgles your residence you go and confide in a detective, who keeps your secret and gets another detective to help him. Generally that is the last of it. In China, not long ago, the house of a missionary was entered and valuables taken by the natives. The missionary went to the authorities with his tale and told them whom he suspected. That's the last he heard of that for three weeks, then he received a covered champaign basket from the department of justice. On opening it he found the heads of the suspected burglars packed in tinfoil and in a good state of preservation. These heads were not sent ne cessarily for publication, but as an evidence of good faith from the department of unimpeded justice. Mind you, there was no postponement of the preliminary examination, no dilatory motions and change of venue, no pieas to the jurisdiction of the court, no legal delays and final challenges of jurors antil an idiotic jury had been precured who hadn't read the papers, no ruling out of damag ing testimony and finally filling of bill of exceptions, no appeal and delay and appeal afterwards to another court, which returned the defendant to the court of original jurisdiction for review and years of waiting for the prosecuting witness to die of old age and thus release defendant there is nothing of that kind in China. You just hand in your orders to the judicial end of the administration, and then you retire. Lates on, the delivery man brings in your package of seads,

Herhaps I'm getting a little nervous in my old age, and a small matter jars my equilibrim; but I'm sure a basket of heads handed in as I was sented at the table would startle me a little at first, and I might forget myself.
